Prediabetes treatments

What's on this page? Coping with a prediabetes diagnosis Main treatments for prediabetes Do doctors treat prediabetes? Medication and prediabetes Will prediabetes go away? Weight loss and prediabetes What's the quickest way to treat prediabetes? Should I buy a continuous glucose monitor for prediabetes? (CGM) Coping with a prediabetes diagnosis It can be a shock to be diagnosed with prediabetes , and it may seem unfair. You may want to process the information for a week or two before you're ready to think about the next steps. If you don't want to talk to friends or family about your diagnosis, do think about talking things through with one of our trained helpline advisors rather than coping with it alone. Call 0345 123 2399. Or reach out on our forum for support. Main treatments for prediabetes The main treatments are: Losing any extra weight , particularly around your middle. Eating a diet higher in fruit and vegetables and wholegrains and lower in processed foods and sugary drinks Increasing physical activity have been shown to help lower blood sugar levels so they return to a normal range. Each of these things – if you're not already doing them – can kick-start the hormone insulin to work better to control blood sugar levels. It's important to break up long periods of time not moving. Research has shown lying down or sitting for long periods of time is linked with type 2 diabetes, even If you do the amounts of recommended physical activity . If you're thinking of changing your diet, losing weight or trying a new physical activity, please speak to your GP first. They can also support you to make long-term health changes - see below. Getting good quality sleep and if you smoke – stopping – have also been linked with a lower risk of developing type 2 diabetes. This is something to aim for if you're trying to reverse prediabetes . See NHS stop smoking services to find local support. Do doctor
