I have type 2 diabetes – what can I eat?

If you've just been diagnosed with type 2 diabetes, one of your concerns might be whether you need to change your diet and cut out foods. Being diagnosed with type 2 diabetes can be daunting and overwhelming. As well as a new diagnosis, you might also feel like you've been given a list of things to do or stop doing. This could include attending several new medical appointments, taking new medication, being asked to stop smoking if you're a smoker or making changes to your diet or physical activities routines. With so much to take in at once and all the myths about diabetes and food that you'll probably hear, it can be hard to know what to do. Everybody's needs are different and we all have our favourite foods but we can help get you started with some healthy food options to try. "When I decided to make changes to my life, diet came first. I looked on the Diabetes UK website and read all about the food I needed to eat. It all looked simple – but to act on it and manage this new way of eating was difficult. I knew I had to do it." Read Zahoor's story of living with type 2 diabetes . On this page: What's the diabetes diet? Low carbohydrate diets Diabetes diet plans to lose weight Breakfast ideas when you have diabetes Lunch ideas when you have diabetes Dinner ideas when you have diabetes Can I eat fruit? Can I snack in-between meals? Get support to eat well What's the diabetes diet? There is no such thing as a special diet exclusively for people with type 2 diabetes. No two people with diabetes are the same. So there isn't a one-size-fits-all way of eating for everyone with diabetes. In the past, people with type 2 diabetes were sent away after their diagnosis with a list of foods they weren't allowed to eat. But our advice is to make healthier choices more often, and only have treats occasionally and in small portions . Because we know that making healthier food choices is important to manage your diabetes and to reduce your risk of diabetes complications, like heart
